PROPERTY MANAGEMENT/BROKERAGE

AT THE END OF THE DAY, The Lund Company is a real estate company. Simply put, they manage, lease, and sell properties. However, the reason they've been successful is that they don't consider themselves a "bricks and mortar" company. They are about people. People living, working, and playing in their properties. When looking through this lens at commercial real estate, it leads one to do things a little differently. "Our people are constantly seeking ways to impact people." That leads to things like an in-house customer care department, a communication system that will send text alerts to people in their buildings, and relationships with owners beyond building management.

"That's the thrill of our business and our industry," says Jason Fisher, president of Cushman & Wakefield/The Lund Company. There are thousands of people in Lund properties every single day. It's a privilege they don't take lightly and makes them better at what they do and more purposeful about the impact on the communities they serve.

Fisher says, "I love our tagline: at the intersection of real estate and real life. That says it all."
